ICE raid leads to another vigil

Community gathers at car wash where agents detained 10% of its workforce

By Julianna Lozada
CORRESPONDENT

First, it was at a bus stop outside a doughnut shop. Then, near a city park where a popular street tamale vendor worked. Then, near Caltech.

Now a car wash.

The list of local spots in Pasadena where immigration raids have happened has continued to mount.

So have vigils that have come in their wake. And so have the federal government's signals to expect more.

The latest vigil was Thursday as nearly 200 attended a "Vigil for Justice" at a Pasadena car wash — the site of a federal immigration raid that detained several employees a week ago.

But even as members of the Clergy Community Coalition in

Editor's note: Keith Sharon is a former longtime reporter for the Orange County Register and Southern California News Group who covered the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in 2005. He currently is a reporter and podcast host for the Tennessean.

Inside: Twenty years ago, staff photographer Keith Blrmingham documented the destruction wreaked by Hurricane Katrina. A9

Tree branches crushed cars. Boats smashed into rooftops.

I saw a coffin floating down the street in floodwaters.

Streetlights didn't work. People drove the wrong way on the interstate highways. Packs of wild dogs ran through downtown New Orleans.

Irene Hutchinson shows her appreciation to search-and-rescue team member Mark Mollet, who brought relief supplies to Hutchinson at her home in St. Bernard Parish after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the area in 2005.

It smelled like wet rot and despair. The air was hot and angry. The wind blew chaos into everything. Nothing resembled the civilization that had been there three weeks previously.

Mayor eager for Olympic diving

L.A. Council could approve venue shift to Rose Bowl Aquatics Center

By Jarret Liotta
CORRESPONDENT

Hoping the Los Angeles City Council will take the final plunge to make it happen, Pasadena Mayor Victor Gordo is excited and hopeful that come 2028, the Olympic diving events will be held at the city's Rose Bowl Aquatics Center.

"I'm excited that the Los Angeles City Council's Olympic Games Ad Hoc Committee has moved us one step closer to seeing the Rose Bowl Aquatics Center host Olympic diving in 2028," Gordo said in a statement on Thursday.

"In the weeks ahead, we are hopeful the Los Angeles City Council will take that final step," he said. "Such a decision would mark an exciting mile-
