SEOUL — Opponents to the Maduro government on Tuesday called for nationwide protests to demand President Nicolás Maduro’s resignation, following the death last week of an opposition politician, and amid reports on Sunday of violent clashes.

An opposition politician, who had called for the tribute on Instagram, was received with cheers by a crowd of thousands in the capital, Caracas, as the Bolivarian National Guard fired tear gas and rubber bullets to disperse the crowd.

Anti-Maduro demonstrators also took to the streets in other parts of the country, including Maracaibo, Lara, and Zulia.

The opposition has been calling for Maduro’s resignation for months, but the government has rejected their demands.

In a speech last week, Maduro said that the opposition was trying to provoke violence and demonstrated his willingness to use force to maintain control.

The government has also limited the internet and access to the media, and has been accused of corruption and human rights violations.

The opposition has vowed to continue its protests until Maduro steps down and free elections are held.
