Iran on March 25 rejected the United States' ceasefire plan to end the war, calling the proposal "excessive," Iranian state media reported, as thousands of U.S. Marines and paratroopers deployed to the Middle East.

Iran considers the 15-point plan delivered through intermediaries "unrealistic" and vows to end the war on its own terms, reported Press TV, Iran's state-run English broadcasting service.

Reuters, citing an unnamed Iranian official, said Iran's response to the U.S. proposal wasn't positive, but that it was still being reviewed.

Three Israeli cabinet sources said Prime Minister

Benjamin Netanyahu's security cabinet had been briefed on the proposal, which they said also included removing Iran's stocks of highly enriched uranium, halting enrichment, curbing its ballistic missile program and ending funding for regional allies, Reuters reported.

The development comes after President Donald Trump delayed striking Iran's power plants, citing "very good and productive" conversations with Iranian leaders that could bring about a "complete and total resolution of hostilities in the Middle East."

Union: TSA 'desperate' for end to shutdown

DENVER – Day after day, flight after flight: Cancun. Orlando. Honolulu. Happy families and college students heading off on spring break vacations are being helped every day by 61,000 unpaid Transportation Security Administration workers.

The screeners reminding travelers to remove liquids from their carry-ons? Unpaid. Those scanning suitcases for guns and knives? Unpaid. Those comparing IDs to prevent terrorists from boarding? Unpaid.

"We're basically invisible and we can't let you see that our guard is down," said Angela Grana, the Colorado-based regional vice president of the union representing TSA workers at 38 airports across the Rockies. "But we are desperate. The anxiety is exhausting."

Across the country, the ongoing partial government shutdown means TSA workers are going unpaid.

ELECTION 2026

Democrat tops Trump House pick

Wayne Washington
Palm Beach Post | USA TODAY NETWORK

Palm Beach Country's most famous Republican, President Donald Trump, will be represented by a Democrat in the Florida House of Representatives.

Emily Gregory defeated Republican Jon Maples in the House District 87 race on Tuesday, March 24, adding fuel to her party's hopes that Trump's unpopularity combined with a message aimed squarely at the increasingly painful cost of living will continue delivering electoral victories this fall.

Gregory

Gregory got just over 51% of the more than 33,000 ballots cast, unofficial figures from the county Supervisor of Elections Office show. Her election – or, more precisely, Maples' defeat – will almost certainly stand as a rebuke of the president, who personally endorsed Maples and whose Mar-a-Lago club and home in Palm Beach is in District 87.

Maples

Gregory's victory was immediately seized upon by the national media as evidence of growing Democratic strength and Trump's growing unpopularity. Less than two hours after her victory, Gregory was a guest on MS Now's "The Briefing" with Jen Psaki.

"It's a pretty wild night," she told Psaki. "When I started this nine months ago, I thought it was possible. I think most people thought I was insane. I'm still pretty shocked. We did it. We just did it."

Gregory called Trump "one of the 115,000 voters in District 87," and added that her opponent "made him forefront in his campaign, and I focused more on the voters of District 87, what everybody needs, what all of us will do better with, with lower property insurance, with expanded health care and with strong public schools."

Trump has castigated voting by mail as "cheating" but election records show that's how he voted. Gregory swamped Maples with mail-in support, pulling in
