CBS pulls ‘60 Minutes’ piece on CECOT prison

Melina Khan
USA TODAY

CBS pulled a “60 Minutes” segment hours before it was set to air on Dec. 21, a move that has apparently sparked backlash from its reporter as well as some members of the public.

The segment was set to feature the notorious El Salvador prison CECOT.

The news program announced the update in a statement around 4:30 p.m. ET on Dec. 21, adding that the piece “will air in a future broadcast.”

“We determined it needed additional reporting,” CBS News said in a statement to USA TODAY.

Sharyn Alfonsi, a correspondent who has worked at the network for more than two decades, reported the piece. Multiple outlets, including The New York Times, NPR and CNN, obtained an email Alfonsi sent to colleagues in which she said the decision to pull the segment “is not an editorial decision, it is a political one.”

USA TODAY has not been able to reach Alfonsi.

“60 Minutes” instead aired a segment on a family of classical musicians, the programming update said.

The show’s social media comments have been flooded with viewers calling on the network to release the original clip.

CECOT, which is officially called the Center for the Confinement of Terrorism and is notorious for harsh and dangerous conditions, has been used to house some migrant detainees from the United States as part of a deal with El Salvador.

An archived programming note said the segment, called “Inside CECOT,” would feature interviews with Venezuelan migrants who had been deported
