Hoodoo Ski Area was sued for $4.6 million after a 4-year-old Eugene girl was injured in a March incident at the resort's terrain park.

The lawsuit, filed Sept. 3 in Linn County Circuit Court, blames the Santiam Pass resort for removing safety ropes, which it said resulted in an adult skier going off a jump and landing on the child on March 7.

The child sustained head and orthopedic injuries, in addition to a spiral femur fracture, a displaced radial fracture, a displaced tibial spine fracture and a partially torn right ACL.

The lawsuit said as a result of the acts or omissions of the resort, the child "has suffered and will continue to suffer pain, disability, disfigurement and scarring, interference with her usual activities, and loss of enjoyment of life."

Hoodoo Ski Area officials said they could not comment on the lawsuit.

Half Moon Bar Lodge, an iconic place to stay for rafters and anglers in southwest Oregon's Rogue River Canyon, has survived a spate of wildfires that ignited after a thunderstorm on Sept. 3.

The Moon Complex grew out of the small fires that were ignited by lightning and burned around both Half Moon Bar Lodge and Paradise Lodge on the Rogue River.

Fire crews accessed the area by jet-boat and helicopter and helped save the two lodges.

The lodges are located on the 34-mile wilderness stretch of the Rogue River west of Grants Pass and east of Gold Beach.
