Neenah's clock tower went from grand City Hall to a standalone landmark

Mara Wegner Appleton Post-Crescent | USA TODAY NETWORK - WISCONSIN

If you've ever visited downtown Neenah, chances are you passed the clock tower. It now stands alone, but the block was once home to Neenah's City Hall. The newspaper archives gives us a look at the original structure that was completed in 1889 and stood at the corner of Cedar Street and Doty Avenue. • The cornerstone was laid March 28, 1889, in which were placed copies of the city newspapers, coins, and other relics of the day, according to a story published Dec. 9, 1889 in the Neenah Daily Times. The story included a detailed line drawing of the structure. See HISTORY, Page 3A

Can immigration officials access your Medicaid data in Wisconsin?

Paul Kiefer

Wisconsin Watch

Can federal immigration officials access personal data on every Wisconsinite enrolled in Medicaid?

Not for now, but the question is winding its way through federal courts.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services last summer signed an agreement with the Department of Homeland Security to give immigration enforcement officers broad access to Medicaid data, which includes names, addresses, claim information and banking details. Trump administration officials claim the agreement is needed "to ensure that Medicaid benefits are reserved for individuals who are lawfully entitled to receive them."

Wisconsin joined 21 other states in a lawsuit challenging the agreement last year.

"Millions of individuals' health information was transferred without their consent," the lawsuit argues. "In doing so, the Trump administration silently destroyed longstanding guardrails that protected the public's sensitive health data."

In December, a federal judge in California ordered that, in states involved in the lawsuit, DHS can access only the names and contact information of undocumented immigrants.

But patient advocates say it's unclear how the agency could separate the records of undocumented immigrants from those of immigrants with legal status.

"The sharing of data is dangerous for all of us at
